An Interview with Samuel

channeled by Lea Schultz

The last interview dealt in part with the evolution of the planet. This brought to mind questions about other kinds of life and consciousness than those we are used to thinking about. We'd like to know more about the nature of life that exists in this dimension but is not of this earth—not in form as we know it—and whether it is part of a spiritual process. For instance, you have said that there are facets of ourselves that are a part of this dimension but that we are unaware of because they are not in physical form.

To begin, could you establish our context by explaining what you mean when you speak of "this dimension."

What do I mean by this dimension? This is the dimension of form. Everything that you see, and a lot of things that have to do with the mechanics—the laws of form—that you don't see is this dimension. Everything that you hear, taste, touch, smell; everything that is recordable—and that's important—is this dimension. It is the dimension through which humanity, the life force on the planet, the very planet, solar system, and galaxy exist. Again, the realm of form.

But you've spoken of our souls, which appear to be outside of form yet in this dimension, and that's one of the things we want to explore.

You want to be careful, because as I use the term, the soul is the part of the human experience that connects to the spirit that you are.

The way you just defined soul is how I have understood higher self.

Nay. Here is how that works: you have the costume, the physical being, the human animal, if you will. That human animal expresses itself as a higher self and a lower self. The lower self is the instinctual creature. The higher self has to do with those choices you make for unity, social acceptance, an intent to grow and change. The higher self is the means by which you are going to reach the soul. The soul is the doorway between pure human and pure spirit.

And that which exists after I'm dead does not have a soul.

Correct. It is pure spirit.

What other kinds of life without form are there, if any, in this dimension?

Everything that has form has a non-physical functional counterpart of spiritual energy—the word simulacrum would work there; so would energy body and etheric body. While here, you have access to your entity, which can be working at a high enough frequency that it can choose to help the process on an unseen level. This is rare, particularly right now, because you are fulfilling your compacts and you are serving in the world. You are a Guardian, and so it's not necessary for a higher function of the spirit that you are to be working outside of you, because you have the ability to open the door for spirit to come through. But somebody who is not fulfilling their compact and not functioning spiritually would more likely have a spiritual, non-form function as a means of fulfilling their compact even though the conscious human is not working at it.

Then there is another class altogether, made up of those energies that have chosen not to work by taking on a form, but still to function within humanity—or within the animal or the plant kingdoms within this dimension—to help bring about the completion of the Plan. They are sometimes called elder brothers or helpers, or guides, or spiritual teachers. They've also been called gods and devils—such things as that.

Then you have those energies that simply work without form but cannot be recognized because the nature of your form is too slow to be able to see it. It's another type of being that you don't see, but is here. Does that sound familiar at all—a being which is a part of life force but you don't see it because it functions at a frequency either above or below your range?

I'm thinking of elementals.

Elemental energy—fairies, for instance—works here. They aren't a part of the Plan that you are working on. They have more to do with the way the planet functions. They play a part here, but you don't see it most of the time.

And finally—and I don't really know if I want to go here—there are those beings who have the ability to change their frequency within certain parameters that would make them somewhat unknown to you. I did not say invisible; I said unknown to you. That tends to include visitors from either other areas of your galaxy or other dimensions of your reality. And unless you come up with a really good question, I'm not going to go further with that.

I wish I could do that quickly, because it sounds like you're entering the realm of science fiction to a certain extent.

I am, certainly.

And you said unknown to us, but not unseen.

Unknown to you but not invisible. If you don't think it's there and you don't know what it's supposed to look like, you're not going to see it.

You mean like natives who couldn't see Magellan's ships out at sea because they had no context for them.

Yes, exactly like that.

In the context of science fiction, that could mean maybe aliens from ascended planets.

Yes, there is that. And non-ascended planets, too.

Perhaps conscious, ensouled, individuated beings who have worked through existence in a material form and have come to the point that they can transcend the physical?

Yes.

But you don't care to elaborate?

I don't want people to get into the idea of . . .

"Mother ships."

I don't want them to go in that direction. To a certain extent that's accurate, just not the way people think it is. And I really don't want to get into some of that New Age stuff that says they can sort of take over, the kind of myth that's out there. I don't want to do that.

You mean like walk-ins and possession?

Beings like the Gray Men, beings that can take over, but are not for the benefit of humanity.

Correct.

So are you saying that beings that have a harmful intent don't come into this dimension?

I want to be careful here because I don't want people to think that I'm talking about aliens coming to visit, or beings that have evil intent, because that's not what I mean. It's accurate to say there is that alien quality to them. You have visitors from other parts of this galaxy and other galaxies in this universe, and you have other-dimensional travelers here all the time, but it doesn't have an impact on you. Just like all of the molecules that make up this box, for instance; you don't see them, but then you don't need to. It doesn't have an impact on you.

Well, part of the thrust of this is the question of who shares this dimension with us.

Much, much more than you would ever imagine—because of the limitations of form.

That's why in a ritual I'll look around and say, "It's crowded," because there are so many energies that are drawn to that kind of work.

I've normally assumed those were essentially other-dimensional energies coming to help.

That too.

But you're saying there are energies floating around here that are pulled in.

Yes, right now, even as we do this interview.

Some of it is simply that, for the multi-dimensional beings, the dimensions intersect so much that they're just doing what they do, and it happens that it goes through here. But there are also visitors that come on purpose, usually to see how the experiment is going or to watch you, because you are very interesting. Sometimes it's to try to shift things some, but never negatively. It's all good, because the Plan and those that hold it—the pattern-keepers and creators—are bigger. Evil can't come here. There isn't a "force of evil." The only evil is that which humanity has made.

So you see, it gets complex.

Well, what is the path that these energies out of other galaxies are taking. Are they on an ascending spiritual path like we are?

No, there is no other Plan like this, which is the individuation of the spirit, through form, through a process of continued frequency change or growth.

This earth, among all of the hundreds of billions of stars, is unique in that?

For now. That is not to say that there are not other plans, but part of the reason that these beings tend to come here to watch is because individuation is quite unique. It doesn't seem so to you though, does it? It doesn't seem like that's such a hard thing or such an odd thing, and yet it is remarkable.

You're implying that all of these beings are more or less a part of a . . .

Group mind, yes.

Group soul is not the right term here, or is it?

Well, group soul can work, too.

So there's an intent and purpose in their plan, but it's simply not one of individuation.

Right.

Is group ensoulment a customary step along the way in the individuation of a species? It seems that you're saying that all of individuation is taking place here on the earth, and up to this point it has been confined to humanity.

No, the mineral kingdom is individuated. Hopefully, after the India trip, the plant and the animal kingdoms will be able to begin that process—hopefully.

But a better way to understand it, perhaps, is that a group soul is the norm. It is natural to spirit. Individuation is the experiment. So, here individuation is the result of moving through the process into something more.

So, does the Plan for this planet fit into a greater plan for the universe of this and other dimensions?

The experiment here is unique. If there is a greater plan that it fits into, it would be something along the lines of “Let’s experiment.” That’s not very helpful, I’m afraid.

Are the other non-individuated existences experiments of some kind?

Not necessarily.

What is their purpose?

To be.

Created to be, or just to be?

Choosing to be.

When you die and leave here, what happens to you?

You told us that for a period of time we’re adjusting to being dead, and reviewing our experiences.

And where are you?

The Crystal Palace.

Where’s that?

[laughing] It’s down the road about six blocks.

I would have thought that it was still part of the edges of this dimension, because we’re still dealing with this experience. That maybe it’s near a portal between . . .

During that time, that would be true, but what about when you get out of that, when you’ve completed what you needed to do in that period of rest, when you’re wandering around the halls of the Crystal Palace after that. Where are you?

I don’t know. I’ve never thought about it.

Well, that’s the answer to that question, and that’s why I can’t put words to it. It’s not as simple as when you take on form. It’s experiential awareness, but there’s not an experiment associated with it, and it’s not awareness as you would necessarily think of it, although it could be if that was needed. It’s a function of pure spirit, guided by experiential awareness.

You’re talking about our entities at this point.

Pretty much, but more than simply yours.

I think that what’s throwing you off here is that you understand everything through the filter of you, your physical form, and I’m trying to express something that doesn’t happen here, that isn’t related to form.

Would you say more about the planet’s process? For example, does the planet have a soul?

You want to remember anything that is a part of form, even if you can’t see it, is measurable, recordable.

Although maybe not currently.

Maybe not yet, but with your current technology you’re really getting pretty good at it. You’re getting better by the moment in recognizing that there is, even beyond a molecular level, something which makes up what’s here. That includes your planet. It’s alive.

I’m going to use an illustration that will be unpleasant to some. You know that your physical body is home to many, many kinds of life. If you looked closely at your skin cells, you would see—invisible to your naked eye—little mites that live off your skin, and also in your gut, and in your heart, and in your blood. You are teeming with life that isn’t your life, it is different kinds of life. I’d like you to think of the planet that way. In effect, you are the parasites on the planet. But you knew that, didn’t you? The planet is a being harboring many kinds of life on it, which both give to the planet and take from it, just as you receive some good things from some of those beings that live on you, and some that are not such good things. For the most part, you never know anything about them, because it’s a system that works. It’s a symbiotic relationship, but whether it’s all one way or the other, it’s still parasitic, yes? The being that is the planet is like the being that is you in some very important ways. It is here for a purpose. It is a very high frequency. It makes choices. It is capable of growth.

Does it have self-awareness?

At times. Generally speaking, the planet goes through phases of change, and when change has led to something radically different, then the planet must consciously make some choices. After that, it moves back into its typical cycles of change.

Is it aware of its purpose? Does it consciously strive toward an end?

You are trying to relate it to life as you know life, but it’s different. Going back into the science fiction mode here, it’s more as though ancient, highly developed functions of life chose to embody a rock in order to make that rock habitable to this experiment. The being that is the planet has given itself to the planet, but that does not stop that being’s process; it just enables the planet to function like a pooka. It gives it a kind of life force of its own.

The way our entities do with our bodies.

Yes. Very good.

Really, we’re the microcosm for that macrocosm in many ways; the same thing at a different scale.

But it’s such a vastly different scale that it’s hard to grok. So this being that is the planet not only has its own journey, but it also transforms under certain circumstances. And that transformation is due to the life force on the planet becoming aware of the individuation of the planet.

Individuation of the planet implies a “group planetary soul.”

In the solar system, there are planets which have already ascended—and I’m referring to the ball of rock, the planet—that had been ensouled by a being that gave life to the rock. The rock, because of the connection with the life force on that planet, is transformed. That transformation either brings about a change in the being that has ensouled that rock, as in Helios/Vesta becoming Vesta/Helios, or the completion of what that planet is capable of, so that it is complete and ascends.

Is this all mediated by Helios/Vesta ?

Helios/Vesta is probably best referred to as a Solar Lord, meaning that it is the primary energy conduit for this solar system. However, the spiritual aspect is quite different from the physical aspect. The physical aspect is, of course, a star, and there are many stars, not all of which are ensouled. There are other ensouled stars, but they are not a part of a solar system with the same purpose as this one. Because of the spiritual evolution toward individuation of the life force on this planet, and a similar purpose on the other planets in this solar system—not quite the same, but similar—Helios/Vesta is a part of a line of beings—I really don’t like that word—that function at such a high level they are capable of ensouling a star. There is a certain amount of flexibility in what their frequency can express while ensouled. That flexibility would appear to you as similar to a personal evolution.

Did that answer that?

I think it did.

In an appropriately vague way.

Yes. You talk about the earth being ensouled so that life could develop on it.

Samuel responds...

I understand that opening the frequency seals on our DNA causes an actual change in the DNA.

No, that's not accurate. It makes it possible, it doesn't cause it to happen.

Does this mean that any children we have afterward could inherit these open seals, or do they have to go through the process of opening for themselves?

That question doesn't really work, because the only ones who can open these frequency seals are the ones that are working at particularly high frequencies, which means that they are Guardians, working here by choice. Any children that are going to be born to Guardians now are going to have things pretty much already set in place. They won't have to work at it like you did, but they're not going to have the options that you do either.

Will those children inherit that DNA?

No, they will not.

So change in the DNA won't become part of the genetic heritage.

No, it will not. But they will have the ability to activate dormant DNA in the same way you do. It could possibly be easier for them, too.

I have heard you mention pets that are "familiars," and some pets that are "Guardians." Please explain the difference as regards their relationship with their human companions.

The first thing you need to remember is that there are Guardian species within all kingdoms. There are plant Guardians and animal Guardians, and there are Guardians within different types of monkeys and dogs, for example.

So there will be a poodle Guardian and a bulldog Guardian.

Well, it's more like there would be a Guardian amidst poodles; there would be a Guardian amidst bulldogs, but they are under the Guardian of canines, which is a function of the group soul.

And that's underneath the function of dogs versus wolves or foxes.

Yes. A Guardian is a member of that kingdom to which it belongs. A familiar is not. A familiar takes on a form for a particular purpose. When a familiar takes on a form, it could be one that happens to be a Guardian of that kingdom; however, being a Guardian doesn't mean you'll be a familiar. They are two different things.

As far as familiars are concerned, it's not likely that any human is ever going to get as close to you as your dog or cat will. There are things that they can and do give that another human cannot because of the separation that keeps you human and individuals. So when a familiar comes into your life as one of your creatures, it is a very easy way to have an effect on you for a particular purpose. Most of the time that purpose is as a temple guard, or a monitor of energy, but there can be other reasons, which I'm not going to go into here.

There are very few creatures in the animal or plant kingdoms that are already moving into individuation. That isn't to say they're fully there, but they're already moving in that direction. This beginning individuation allows for a specific animal—if it is advanced enough—to actually function as a Guardian amongst its species.

For example, "Fido" is incredibly smart, he thinks, communicates in his own way, and is self-aware. He is in the process of individuating. Because of that, when Fido lands in a home with a high-frequency Guardian, Fido's individuation process is accelerated. If he is a part of a Guardian species—as canines are—then it is possible that Fido can grow into Guardianship as he grows into his individuation.

He isn't born a Guardian—unlike humans, who are already individuated—but the possibility for Guardianship exists. Even though it's dormant, it is built into any Guardian species now that we are so close to Sacred Status. This is because the plant and animal kingdoms have to be individuated in order to be a part of that. So if you have a dog that is individuating then the built-in chance for individuated guardianship will start coming into play.

On the other hand, it doesn't require being in the process of individuation or having completed it in order to be a familiar. If the energy that we call familiars should decide to take on the body of Fido, who is individuating and awakening to guardianship, that would be the way—the very rare way—a familiar could be a Guardian. But a Guardian creature or plant doesn't have the means to take on a body—it already is in a body—unlike the energy we call familiars. Therefore, a Guardian dog can't choose to be a familiar.

It is not unusual for Guardians to have familiars, but it's very unusual to have a Guardian creature around you because they are so rare. Imagine all of the poodles there are. What are the chances that you're going to get the one that is a Guardian? That Guardian poodle would probably have a greater effect elsewhere, rather than in the household of a human Guardian.

So is a familiar not a part of the group soul?

Well, here's what happens: if a familiar embodies a form for too long, it forgets it's a familiar, and as a result of that becomes a part of the form it is in. It becomes a part of the group soul of that form it has embodied.

Even after that form dies?

No, after that form dies, it is released. This is a lot like what happens to some of you.

So a familiar is usually in and out of your life within a short time. To you it seems that it contracted feline respiratory virus or was hit by a car when it was young, and it leaves.

If you have a familiar that has forgotten, it's a very sad thing, because it's trapped.

So our creaky old dog, Winston, either never was a familiar or, given his age, he has forgotten he is one.

I understand what you're saying, but here is the thing: Winnie is a familiar, but you have not had him all of his life. He embodied because there was an open door for him. Most familiars are embodied pretty much at birth, but it doesn't always have to be that way.

For example, WuHu is not a familiar, but if he continues stabilizing, he might become one because familiar energy would embody him. He would become for Frank what Winnie is for you. What does he do for you?

He inspires me with love and admiration, and he opens my heart.

Yes, and he balances you. And balance is a very needed thing for Guardians. Winnie's old now, but he's not been a familiar all that time, so I don't see him forgetting. I don't see him living long enough to forget.

Can we help a familiar to not forget?

No, because the familiar is there for you. You aren't there for them.

How can an animal that is part of a group soul seemingly choose to individuate?

Well, as I've said, a familiar isn't really a dog or a cat, so this question isn't talking about a familiar.

I guess the question is, How does an unindividuated soul spontaneously give rise to individuals? If it isn't a general canine-wide thing of all souls within the group soul individuating, what sets a few apart?

One year-old children have a sort of group mind, yet amidst them there are those that stand out, that are advanced. That's pretty much how that happens. Within any group soul, there are those that are very enmeshed with the form that they are a part of, and by the nature of their breed or species have a higher mind function, so much so that they become self-aware. When there is self-awareness, that starts a process of shifting out of the group soul.

For example, most dogs will see themselves in a mirror and bark, because they are sure there's another dog there. They might even throw themselves at it. They never realize that it's the very same dog looking back at them. Most dogs don't care what they look like. "I stink? Why do you think I stink? I smell great!" But then there are those that look at the mirror and might bark for a moment but then they get it. By the way, a lot more birds have that figured out than dogs do. Self-aware cats have a sense of dignity. My point is that occasionally you will come across it, but for the most part you don't because most creatures are not smart enough.

Will that change if the work in India is successful, and the animal kingdom moves toward individuation? How will that affect familiars?

Well, it won't affect familiars and Guardians so much, but it will affect the creatures that are here already. You will see changes in your own creatures take place, but much more slowly. The biggest difference will be seen in those that are born after that time. And, after a period of time, you will see a profound difference.

What is the difference between the Lords of the Rays, the Twelve Cohans, the Original Twelve, and the Twelve Perfecti?

Those were pretty much all taught at different times and have little bearing on what I'm teaching now. That's the difference.

The megalithic structures on Earth are characterized by massive stones that are often irregularly shaped, and sometimes placed together with incredible precision. How were structures like the Osirion at Abydos and the Great Pyramid in Egypt, Stonehenge in England, and Sacsayhuaman in Peru constructed?

They were constructed with a type of engineering that worked at that time, and if you would not insist on thinking that your forebears were stupid and that you are the height of the evolution of your species, then you would give them more credit.

Usually, vibration or water or both were used for shaping those things. And I don't know that putting the stones together was done differently from how you would do it now. Now you have machinery for it, of course.

You may have a block that's a hundred and fifty tons that needs to be lifted up a hundred feet.

Like a wall.

Or the pyramids.

Aye, well they used ramps and balls or rollers, for the most part.

I remember being impressed at Sacsayhuaman at the irregularity of the stones and how one curve could be carved so accurately to fit another. That's what the question is getting at.

Did heat play a part in the process of shaping the stones?

When you are cutting with water, it is a function of temperature, but it's not like a laser, if that was the implication.

One who understands the rock—whether it is a diamond in the rough or a slab of granite or a bluestone—one who recognizes it and works with it can see its natural shape and faults. If you fill a crack with water so that it stays in the crack, and then winter comes, what's going to happen?

It will split.

And if that is along a fault, what's likely to happen?

The split would continue along the fault.

Yes, extending further. If you're capable of doing that by design, because like a very good jeweler can look at the rough diamond and say, "Here is how this needs to be cut to bring out its brilliance," you could see that here is how this needs to be frozen and heated—because both will do it—to become the shape that is needed here. It's very simple.

I have a hard time believing that frequency isn't already in use in some way or another because to separate on a molecular level is much faster and accurate than it is on the more gross scale, and sound frequency does it on the molecular level.

Some say that the most powerful of Atlantis's crystals were secreted away before its final destruction, to be activated at a later date, like now. Where are these fabled crystals now, and will they be used as we proceed toward the completion of Sacred Status?

They are in your or someone else's sweet dreams. It's a fantasy. Nevertheless, you can count on someone "finding" them and teaching a special few "how to use them." Do you need to say I'm dripping with irony here?

If you have a question for the Samuel Responds column, please e-mail it to PhoenixNewsletter@windstream.net. Samuel determines which ones get answered, but try to avoid "yes-no" questions as they usually get a "yes" or "no" answer. Samuel won't answer questions about who he is, or anything that puts the focus on him rather than on the work.

◀ Interview, from p. 4

Would our sun have been ensouled in order for the solar system to exist?

Yes.

That's what allowed the earth to be ensouled?

Exactly. That is what allowed the star—the sun—to be ensouled, because that was necessary for the solar system, because that was necessary for the planet, because that was necessary for the life force on the planet—all of it in order to accommodate the earth's specific experiment and all of those planets around that star.

Does the illustration continue on so that the galaxy has a support being in the universe, and so on?

It's planet, solar system, galaxy, universe, and I don't want to go beyond galaxy simply because things change so much. Ultimately, yes it does go beyond it, but it doesn't matter because this is the only realm that would make any sense to you.

So energy transformation stations that you have spoken of, like Venus, the Pleiades, Capella and others, they in turn are ensouled for the purpose of this experiment here on earth.

Yes, but I'm going to throw a wrench in that. That has not always been the case. A filter didn't always have to be in this galaxy. In other experiments it has been elsewhere. The key word there is other—experiments that did not work.

Helios/Vesta is the spirit of the sun, and you spoke of it as being one of a line. Is that line made up of the spirits of Capella and others stars that are ensouled?

It's made up of those beings who have chosen to ensoul in order to bring about a particular end, in this dimension as you know it. It's not its sole purpose.

You described Helios/Vesta's ensoulment of the sun. What might the other purposes be for these other stars and solar systems? Are we even capable of understanding them?

Any that you are aware of are dedicated to the earth experiment. The greater purpose is always continued creation.

The expansion of Source.

Yes. But when you leave that which works in the realm of form, you leave thought and purpose—which is a thought—so in that sense it's all for here.

At last year's retreat, you mentioned that Mars was ready to extend a helping hand at this critical time. Does that mean the planets relate to each other consciously? Apart from the gravitational effects they have on each other, do they interact?

Based on what I have already said in this interview, can you answer that? Can the planets interact? Can they help one another?

Well, the simple answer is yes.

Yes, because it's all about this earth experiment. It's all for this seemingly insignificant planet that has parasites.

Is this all mediated by Helios/Vesta—or is this is a trivial question?

No, it's just a limited one. The closest thing to mediation would be Helios/Vesta, because as the Solar Lord, it holds the pattern, but once you move out of form, it is a continually higher frequency, all of which mediates everything lower.

SOUTHERN LIGHTS

CLIFF JUMPING

by Dina Shadwell and the Writers Gallery

Spring always feels like such a blessing, with its gifts of renewal and rebirth. But as I write this, I am looking out over a snowed-in Atlanta, reflecting on the “Year of Renewal” that was 2010, poised for the “Year of the Guardian” that Samuel has promised us for 2011. It seems that no matter what the season or year, any time is a good time for renewal. And Samuel teaches that renewal doesn’t happen without some kind of death—dying to the old, to what no longer works for us. This kind of transition can happen at any time, whether we seek it out, or it seeks us out. Sometimes I have found myself suddenly at the edge of a cliff wondering, “How did I get here? I didn’t see it on my map!” Sometimes I run passionately toward what I hope is a new and exciting cliff I can fling myself off of.

Samuel spoke of our need to forgive ourselves—not for choosing the parents we chose, but for not understanding why we chose them.

This past year I have found myself honing the craft of cliff-jumping. One big cliff that found its way to me was my mother’s transition out of this world, which provided me with several months to reflect, to re-invent myself. With my father already gone, I was given the chance to decide who I am going to be without parents. Do I need a mother to make me whole and complete? Instead of the ideal Julie Andrews-style mother I wanted but never had, can I find the mother within myself? Can I provide my own nurturing and heal the childhood wounds I thought I had dealt with already? What beliefs am I holding onto about what I need in order to be what I truly am?

Last spring Samuel spoke of our need to forgive ourselves—not for choosing the parents we chose, but for not understanding why we chose them. I have had to make a huge leap of faith that I can be the whole, complete, and ready Guardian I compacted to be without the guiding (or misguiding) force of parents in my life, and that the gifts I received from my parents will continue to reveal themselves for the rest of my life. Or not. More likely the bigger picture will only reveal itself once I am outside of form. Regardless, my mother’s death has given me the gifts of forgiveness and of trust in the universal cycles of death and renewal.

My journey this past year also led me to another cliff, one that I actively sought out. I decided to go back to school to learn new skills that will allow me not just to use my creativity, but to find prosperity while I do it. (So be it!) Going back to school seemed like an easy cliff to jump off of. But just around the corner awaits an even bigger cliff: once I finish school and leave my current job, I will need to create successes along my new path. I have caught myself describing this journey as “exciting and scary.” But in this Year of the Guardian, as we are functioning more and more in our full Shining power, I am pushing myself to reframe my thoughts. Why does the unknown have to be scary? Why can’t it just be exciting? Samuel has suggested that we will see our thoughts come into manifestation quickly and easily this year. If I am trusting in my power and the bigger picture, why would I choose to place an obstacle of fear in front of me? Okay—it looks like a very large cliff, and I can’t see beyond the edge from here. But who’s to say there’s not a giant fluffy cloud right there to sweep me away into a world even greater than my thick (precious, beautiful) brain could ever imagine?

And now we are into our year, poised on the edge of a cliff that we have been traveling towards (or sometimes running away from) our whole life—our raison d’être, also known as the “completion of the Plan.” I know I am not alone in feeling like we are more and more fully embracing, experiencing, serving as a vehicle for the Shining Energy that we are. Exciting? Absolutely! Scary? Let’s say not, especially since we’re all standing at the precipice together. I can only dream of what’s awaiting us once we make the leap. Take my hand?
